Assistance may be provided by system administrators and/or technical support staff. A request for assistance is often referred to as a help request. A help request may be placed by the customer, or user, in the form of a ticket. As an example, a user may submit a ticket or report a problem by visiting a help desk of a company. Help desks are frequently part of a call center, where employees of the call center or a third-party company attempt to resolve customer or user issues. An exemplary help desk may be found in U.S. patent application Ser. No. 14/238,377, filed on Apr. 20, 2014, which is incorporated herein by reference in its entirety. A help desk may be a dedicated physical space, a logical space, or a combination of both. A help desk may be referred to as a help desk area, a support desk, a helpdesk, a support, or any other suitable name. A help desk area may be located at a call center, a corporate headquarters, a hospital, or any other suitable location. A help desk area may also be found at a variety of locations where different types of help desk services are performed, such as help desk areas at government facilities, organizations, businesses, or any other suitable locations. A help desk typically has at least one human resource representative, such as a help desk agent or employee. The help desk may also have at least one workstation with a computer system that can provide assistance to a user who submits a help request or problem report. The help desk area may also have many computers where users can submit their help requests or problem reports. One way to manage help desk areas is to designate an individual, such as a help desk agent, to be the point of contact or point of interaction for a help request or problem report. The individual may then be able to assist a customer or end-user with their issue. If the help f988f36e3a
